Losing a Best Friend

A journal for losing the person who knew you best

*"Write it. Feel it. Heal it.
Your journal knows the real you."*

A note before you begin

People don't always understand grief for a friend the way they do for family — but a best friend can be the person who knew you better than almost anyone. This loss is real, and it deserves a real place to process it.

How did you meet? Tell the whole story, even the small details.

What's a memory with them that still makes you smile?

What did they understand about you that almost no one else did?

What's an inside joke, phrase, or tradition that was just yours two?

What's something they did for you that you never really thanked them for?

What role did they play in your life — the one who made you laugh, the one who kept you grounded, the one who always showed up?

What's the first thing that felt different once they were gone?

What's something you still want to text or call them about?

Who do you turn to now for the things only they got?

Is there a place, song, or time of year that brings them right back?

What does friendship look like for you now, without them in it?

Write them a letter. Say whatever's still sitting unsaid.

What's something you wish you'd told them more often?

What's a piece of them you carry in how you show up for other people now?

What would you want them to know about your life today?

What's one thing that felt okay today, even a small thing?

What do you need permission to feel today?

What's a way you can honor their memory this week?

Write down one thing you know for sure, even if everything else feels uncertain.

Not every family is related by blood.

Thank you for finding each other — and for letting yourself grieve them the way you would anyone who mattered this much.
