Losing a Parent

A journal for the loss that changes everything

*"Write it. Feel it. Heal it.
Your journal knows the real you."*

A note before you begin

Losing a parent rearranges something in you, no matter what your relationship looked like. There's no single "right" way to grieve them — this is just a place to sit with it, honestly, at your own pace.

What's a memory of them you go back to the most?

What did they teach you — on purpose, or just by being who they were?

What's something about them only you and a few others would know?

What's a phrase or saying they always used?

Describe a completely ordinary day with them. Not a big moment — just a regular one.

What do you wish more people knew about who they really were?

What's the first thing that felt different once they were gone?

Is there a certain time, place, or holiday that hits hardest?

What's something you still reach for the phone to tell them?

Who do you turn to now for the things you used to bring to them?

What does "moving forward" mean to you, without it meaning "moving on from them"?

What would you want them to see about your life right now?

Is there anything you wish you'd asked them while you could?

What's something you carry from them that you hope to pass on?

What's one thing that felt okay today, even a small thing?

Grief doesn't run on a schedule. What do you need permission to feel today?

What's a way you can honor them this week?

Write down one thing you know for sure, even if everything else feels uncertain.

You don't stop being their child just because they're gone.

Carry them with you — not as a weight, but as a piece of who you are.
