

PRINTABLE GUIDED JOURNAL

Losing a Pet

A journal for losing your best friend

"Write it. Feel it. Heal it. Your journal knows the real you."

A note before you begin

There's no timeline for this kind of loss, and no rulebook for how much it should hurt. They were there for the ordinary days, not just the big ones — and that's exactly why the quiet afterward feels so loud. This is just a place to put it down.

What was their name, and how did they get it?

How did they come into your life? Tell the whole story, even the boring parts.

What did their day-to-day look like — where did they sleep, what did they wait by, what made their ears perk up?

What's one habit of theirs that made you laugh every single time?

What's a memory with them you've never told anyone?

If they could talk for one day, what do you think they'd say to you?

What's the first thing you noticed was different after they were gone?

Is there a spot in your home that still feels like theirs?

What time of day do you miss them the most, and why do you think that is?

What's something you almost did out of habit — filled their bowl, grabbed the leash — before you remembered?

What does the quiet sound like now?

What do you wish you'd known, back when you had more time?

What's something you'd want them to know about your life now?

If you believe you'll see them again someday, what does that reunion look like?

Today, what's one small thing that felt okay?

You don't have to be over this. What's one thing you can do today just because it's kind to you?

What's a way you could honor them, big or small?

It's okay if you're not okay yet. Write down one thing you know for sure, even if it's small.

Grief is just love with nowhere left to go.

Thank you for loving them the way you did — and for letting yourself feel this instead of rushing past it.
