Losing a Sibling

A journal for losing part of your story

*"Write it. Feel it. Heal it.
Your journal knows the real you."*

A note before you begin

A sibling is one of the only people who knew you before you became who you are now — the inside jokes, the childhood memories only the two of you share. Losing them is losing a piece of your own history, too. This is a place to hold onto that, and to grieve it honestly.

What's your earliest memory of them?

What did you fight about as kids — and what did you always have each other's back on?

What's something about your childhood that only makes sense if you were both there?

What's a habit, phrase, or inside joke that was just theirs?

What role did they play in your family — the peacemaker, the troublemaker, the quiet one?

What's something about them you don't think you ever told them?

What's the first thing that felt different once they were gone?

What's something you still want to call and tell them?

Is there a certain memory, place, or time of year that hits the hardest?

Who do you turn to now for the things only they understood?

What does it feel like to be the one still carrying your shared history?

Write them a letter. Say whatever's still sitting unsaid.

What's something you wish you'd done together?

What's a piece of them you see in yourself?

What would you want them to know about your life now?

What's one thing that felt okay today, even a small thing?

What do you need permission to feel today?

What's a way you can keep their memory close this week?

Write down one thing you know for sure, even if everything else feels uncertain.

They were part of your story before either of you had any say in it.

That doesn't end — it just changes shape. Carry them with you.
