Losing a Parent

A journal for the loss that changes everything.

*"Write it. Feel it. Heal it.
Your journal knows the real you."*

BEFORE YOU BEGIN

A Note Before You Begin

Losing a parent rearranges something in you, even if you saw it coming, even if your relationship was complicated. You go from having someone ahead of you in line to being next — and that shift is enormous, whether or not anyone around you understands it that way. There's no timeline for this. Some days it's quiet.

Some days it's everything. This is a place for both.

How would you describe them to someone who never met them?

What's a memory with them that still makes you smile?

What did they teach you — on purpose, or just by being who they were?

What's something they always said, a phrase or habit that was completely them?

What did they do for you that you never really thanked them for?

What role did they play in your life — the one who worried, the one who showed up, the one who made things feel steady?

What's the first thing that felt different once they were gone?

What's something you still want to call and tell them?

ilikeitdeep.us

Who do you turn to now for the things only they gave you?

Is there a place, a holiday, or a song that brings them right back?

What does it feel like to be the older generation now, if that's part of what changed?

Write them a letter. Say whatever's still sitting unsaid.

What's something you wish you'd told them more often?

If your relationship was complicated, what's true that you're still making peace with?

What's a piece of them you carry in how you show up for your own family now?

What's one thing that felt okay today, even a small thing?

What do you need permission to feel today — including relief or anger, if that's part of it?

What's a way you can honor their memory this week?

Write down one thing you know for sure about who they were to you, even if everything else feels uncertain.

*They gave you a beginning.
You get to decide what you do with everything after.*
