The Space Between

On Being Adopted and Carrying Abandonment

*"Write it. Feel it. Heal it.
Your journal knows the real you."*

WELCOME

Before You Begin

Adoption can be a gift and a wound at the same time, and both things can be true without canceling each other out. You might love your family completely and still carry a question mark about where you started. You might feel grateful and still feel a loss you're not supposed to name out loud. There's no wrong way to feel about your own story. This is a place to hold all of it — the gratitude, the grief, and everything living in the space between.

How would you describe 'the space between' in your own words — what does it feel like to live there?

PART ONE

Where I Come From

Your story didn't start the day you were placed. It started before that.

PART TWO

The Space I Live In

Belonging isn't always simple when you carry two beginnings.

PART THREE

What I Carry

Abandonment leaves fingerprints, even decades later.

What's a belief about your own worth that you think traces back to being placed for adoption?

There's no rush here.

What's something you needed to hear as a child that you can start saying to yourself now?

Feel it, then let it move.

What's one thing you know for sure about your own worth, separate from anyone who left?

This is brave work.

BONUS

Things That Are True

Read these when the space between feels too big. Check what you needed to hear today.

- ☐ I did not cause my own abandonment
- ☐ I am allowed to love more than one family
- ☐ My questions don't make me ungrateful
- ☐ My birth story is not my fault
- ☐ I get to define what family means to me
- ☐ I am allowed to grieve what I don't know
- ☐ Belonging is something I can build, not just something I'm given
- ☐ I am worthy of a love that stays

My Own Definition of Family

*You were never unwanted.
You were carried by more than one story,
and both are yours.*
